General overview:

Erin Zayko is a self-proclaimed renaissance woman with a flare for optimism and creativity emboldened by a passion for critical thought. Before graduating with a Bachelors degree in Anthropology and a Political Science focus, Erin was a Market Manager for a publically traded sportswear company where she learned early the value of efficient business management. The merits of efficiency, a devotion to public service, and a zest for the Great Outdoors culminated after graduation when Erin began her professional career. She became the Coordinator for Smart Growth San Antonio followed by a position as a fundraiser for Aquifer Guardians in Urban Areas, gaining experience in the realm of sustainable planning, design, and resource conservation. Erin furthered her knowledge of the nonprofit arena as a Program Associate in the Grants and Programs Community Initiatives department at the San Antonio Area Foundation, during which time she completed UTSA's Nonprofit Management and Leadership course. In 2008, Erin accepted a position with Lockheed Martin's Energy Services division where she works with both Federal and State energy efficiency and green building programs, applying her recently achieved LEED® AP accreditation and supporting Lockheed Martin's internal Go Green effort. "Every day we see an increased focus on sustainable building design, construction, and operation. I'm so thrilled to be a part of the Green mainstream movement working within both the public and private sectors to demonstrate the financial savings and quality of life improvements linked to green building."
